Concluded from first page.

"All we ever heard of him was from the outside boatmen, and they wouldn't have anything to say. You remember that night—Sunday evening? It was late, and very dark—"

"Ah yes—"

"It was dark, however, but that I could see the figure of a man distinctly as it came lurching, as it seemed to me, in the glimmer of the sentinel. Then I saw, or fancied I saw, something, I can't exactly say upon the word, that looked a man sprang out upon him with a knife—"

"Dear—"

But the blade glanced off against the book in my breast pocket—the book you had just given me, remember, and so it slipped, caught him by the sweet, and tried to extract it from his grasp. Then we had a fine struggle, and in the midst of that struggle the blade broke. Stung as lightening, my friend changed his tactics, and shrieked at me, threat: so I just tripped him up, and flung him on the pavement—"

"And then?"

"And then, in an unlucky moment to him, he got his teeth upon my forefinger, and bit it to the bone. Till now I had treat not to whatever him; but when I found him tearing on like a hell-dog, I confess I lost my temper—"

"Oh, Cosmo! what did you do?"

"Did I will tell you what I did," says Horace, with grim humour. "I put my arm affectionately round his neck, reminded it that was left of my finger out of his mouth, and pounded him over the head and face till I was out of breath. How long that lasted, I had no means of judging; but finally he fell like a log, face downward. That frightened me. I heaped up a basketful of water from the well, gave him a breathing, and got him out into the air. The poor devil acted heartily enough (I believe, on both sides) to be of some help; and I contrived to make me understand where he wanted to go; so I half dragged, half carried him to his retreat of the Via Stelle, where his own occupant I propped him against the wall, and left him. He may be there to this moment, for aught I know."

His world have moved on—"

Instead of which I very nearly murdered him. But what childishness is this—You tremble: your hands are like ice! My Gia lotta, my darling!"

He takes her in his arms. He soothes her—one might soothe a frightened child.

It was her book, she must remember—it was her dear old Lolgi de Forte, that turned the knife aside. Glory to think of that! She is not, therefore, bound to love her, if morally, less tender more than ever—to cherish her life to her latest day! Ah, how happy he would try to make her! And what a earthly paradise they two would find in that little white house upon the hillside of Fiesole!

If the knife-ray of Cosmo's book-stroke had been a little more direct, her thoughts still so long on the same theme—

"I am sorry to say it has made a dint on the engraving of the parchment cover. Not that we shall have it rebound on account, or, even that, as a matter. And now let us have on with the past. It is dead and buried, and not worth remembering. The poor at our own, the future lies fair before us.

I would not have the book rebound for all the world," she says, passionately. "That cut is sacred. It saved your life—my love! my love!"

The shining water is all around them now—soft, with its dreams and magic of sky and sea, and the long, low amber rim of the Lucrine Lake—

Which takes out to-morrow, and from his [illegible]

It is not so plain dear, as the one I put on every longer morning.

"I seem"—it is a ring for a princess—

It is a ring for my queen. Now let us see what's under the bust."

And with a kiss to each of occasion, he takes off first upon one and then upon another.

But these, sirrah, are diamonds—" says Horace, "and—beautiful though they are—it is not of for you.

They are diamonds,—yes, but they are after large not valuable. And as for the artistic! there he can not help smiling—Wow, I should have been dead some years recently years ago if it were mine. And although that elderly gentleman in the other end-ribbon was a king in his day, I would rather be myself and your husband.

A king!"

Carries the Town of Spain. I do happens my little Cenbotia ever heard of [illegible]

"Why, no! What is a great king [illegible]

"But he was a fairly good one, which is not so rare, and relatively speaking, a great one; it even said that he never forgot poet—but that, of course, is incredible. portrait, you see, is surrounded by the royal crown of Spain in small diamonds."

I never saw anything so beautiful. I am afraid to wear it.

Nay child, wear it, break it, lose it. It is your own, and when it is gone I will buy another. That silver cord would prove a trick though but a piece of brass would be of more intrinsic value. The ring is only a curious trifle—"

"It is a relyd ring, and you brought it for me—"

"No, be answers, earnestly. "I bought it with some other things, remember, when I—I not know of your existence—and had not learned as yet sacred to possess it, but because it went with the lot. It was more hours that I had not thrown it away before your—realized its use, with it, as the Doges did time ago to do here in Venice. But it is well, for your sake, [illegible] that the ring did not get it."

He has taken amber-like has appeared—the uplifted itself from the ground level of the square. It assumes a broken outline. It resolves itself into a long flight of steps, rocks and hollows of many sand, darkened here and there by patches of growth.

"Are you still minded for a glimpse of the Adriatic" asks Horace, as their gondola is putting down the shallows.

"I am still minded for a glimpse of the Adriatic" says Cosmo, as their gondola is putting down the shallows.

"Then, you know, and these sands are not pleasant to walk on."

But she minds neither the sands nor the rock, and soon they stand on the summit of the ridge, and the view lies open to them on all sides—on the one hand the placid lagoon on the other, stealing up in long, low bays, and creeping intensely against the lines, the dark blue Adriatic.

The girl clings silently to Horace's arm, as the first view she has ever seen the sea.

They linger there, listening to the soft, monotonous surge, watching the gathering shadows, till the darkness warns them to their gondola.

This same evening, at this self-same hour, the Mall runs, nicely seeming into the terraces at Brunet, from the first flight of winter tourists, most of whom are English, bound for Nervosa.

Though it is already summer in Venice, the evening here—at Genoa—is cold and damp, and save two ladies who have been walking up and down for the last ten minutes or so, and one or two officials in blue and silver uniform, the arrival platform is almost empty.

At the train creeps in, heavily laden, the taller of these ladies steps somewhat in advance of her companion, and peers eagerly over the edge of the platform. The next moment a man's hand and arm are seen out of one of the windows, a door is opened, and, contrary to all railway regulations, a young man jumps out while the train is yet moving.

"Lancelot!"

"Ivo here, Winifred! This is what I did not expect."

He grasps her hands with passionate eagerness. He all but takes her in his arms and kisses her.

"What on top is sooner since we parted years instead of months! And oh, how slow the train was! At every station I longed to get out and thrash the porters! Darling, darling, how well you are looking! Is that Frederick Brooke? But stay! I have a surprise for you—a great surprise. You seem to know nothing till whatever I tell you. You are here, there is no help for it. I am not alone."

"Not alone!" Winifred repeats, looking nervously round. "What do you mean [illegible] Ah!"

And with a cry of joyful recognition, she finds herself face to face with Mr. and Mrs. Pennefather.

CHAPTER LIII.

WINNING HEARS.

"So I see you've found out my secret. Well, and would be a fable to keep it from you. My child, I knew it as well as if I had peeped into the heart of the Future."

"But could you have—could I did not know myself until Sunday, when I met Lancelot Pennefather—"

"Which you, my dear, would not have met on Sunday if you had not been a little [illegible]
